A leaked internal memo from the special counsel Robert Mueller's office details the investigation into Russia's meddling in the 2016 presidential election. The investigation concluded in a few short sentences: "The Investigation did not establish that members of the Trump Campaign conspired or coordinated with the Russian government in its election interference activities." Here's the important part: "As to whether the President can be found to have obstructed justice by exercising his powers under Article II of the Constitution, we conclude that Congress has authority to conduct criminal investigations and to exercise oversight of the Justice Department and Federal Bureau of Investigation." That statement reflects the problem with Mueller's obstruction inquiry: a witness can obstruct a criminal investigation if he takes a legally impermissible action, even if the action is outside the course of his official duties and even if he lacks the requisite criminal intent. The Mueller memorandum is revealing in another way. The Mueller investigation was not about Russian interference in the election. It was about the links between the Trump campaign and Russia. It started as a counterintelligence investigation and evolved into an obstruction of justice investigation. From the beginning, Mueller believed there was more to the case than a few meetings between campaign officials and a few Russians. There were also Trump's post-election conversations with his top national security officials, and his comments and actions after he won. Trump is said to be fuming at his "deep state" detractors in the Justice Department and the FBI. Trump's ire was 54b84cb42d
